Lactic Acid for beef/chicken carcass decontamination

Meat is considered to be highly susceptible to microbiological contamination including food borne pathogens such as E. Coli and Listeria Monocytogenes. Even with the most careful, sanitary slaughter and dressing procedures, bacteria on the hide, skin or guts of food animals can end up on the carcass following slaughter. Canadian Government meat inspection agencies recommend using an organic acid rinse to reduce the risk.

Lactic acid rinse is effective at decontaminating beef carcasses after trimming against a wide range of microorganisms without altering the quality of the finished product. It is most user friendly due to its pleasant odour and mild to the workers' skin.

Lactic Acid for the meat poultry industry

Lactic Acid offers a wide range of benefits in meat poultry and seafood processing such as microbial activity control, flavour enhancement, texture improvement and colour stability.

It corrects acidity in canned meat and delicatessen products. It improves colour and taste and has a positive influence on the pH value and therefore delays microbial growth.
